It is surprisingly easy to change a computer's MAC address, and it often takes place in the dark. This may lead to serious problems, like decreased quality of network connections, since MAC addresses are necessary for the correct routing of data packets. So if you want to secure your network, you should pay close attention to MAC addresses! The only downside about this program is that it does not really protect your PC in the right way. There is no "off switch" to turn the spoofing function off. So if this "fake MAC address" is needed, you should stick to it. After the installation completes, you have to select your network adapter to spoof it. You can select it from the drop-down list. There is no option to specify the adapter in the system setup screen by setting its properties. This becomes quite annoying when you need to rename or disable an adapter, as it is not possible to use the "Custom" and "Advanced" buttons. When you have selected the adapter you want to spoof, click the "Spoof MAC" button to change the adapter's MAC address. If you want to revert the change, click the "Spoof MAC" button again. If the MAC address has not been changed yet, it will work as expected. Otherwise it will revert the changes, which is a matter of course, as no spoofing will take place again. If you want to set a custom MAC address, click the "Advanced" button in the Options window. This will open the Advanced Options window. Here you can select the adapter in the box, and you can select one or more MAC addresses in the drop-down list. The MAC address for the next startup will be chosen from the drop-down list. The MAC address for the adapter you have selected will be changed.
